DOLLY THE SHEEP LEADS PROTEST AGAINST LAMB CHOPS

Dolly leading the march through Edinburgh.

Edinburgh, Scotland — In a surprising turn of events, Dolly the Sheep—the world’s first cloned mammal—reemerged today in the public eye, not for science, but for social change.

Sporting a woolen sash reading “Baaack Off My Family,” Dolly marched with a flock of fellow ovine activists through the heart of Edinburgh, demanding an end to the global consumption of sheep meat.

“As a sheep and a mother, I cannot remain silent while my kin are served with mint jelly,” Dolly bleated through a wool-muffled megaphone. “We are companions, not cuisine.”

The demonstration, organized by the newly formed group EWE (Ethical Woolly Union for Equality), drew dozens of protestors, both sheep and human. Signs reading “Fleece Not Feast,” “Mutton is Murder,” and “Think Before You Chew” fluttered above the crowd as they made their way to the Scottish Parliament.

The movement has sparked heated debate among locals. One butcher, who asked to remain anonymous, said, “I respect her legacy, but this is baa-rmy.” Meanwhile, animal rights groups are rallying behind Dolly, declaring her a symbol of post-lab compassion and conscious resistance.

Dolly, who once represented a pinnacle of genetic science, now represents something perhaps even more powerful—a voice for her voiceless herd. As she stood on the Parliament steps, hooves raised in protest, her message was loud and clear:

“We’re more than dinner. We’re baa-eautiful beings.”

The Scottish Parliament has yet to respond, but one thing is certain: Dolly’s baaack—and she’s not sheepish about it.
